

In recent times, a positive transformation has taken place in the world economy, recognizing the indispensable role of the care workforce, with nurses positioned at its core. This paradigm shift signifies a monumental acknowledgement of the genuine value of nurses and underscores the central role of healthcare systems in world economy. As leaders worldwide embrace this change, there is a collective effort to prioritize advancement of education within the health sector, propelling nursing into the spotlight. World leaders, cognizant of the intrinsic link between healthcare and societal well-being, are championing the idea that healthcare investment should be viewed not as a mere cost but as a strategic and high-yield investment for the collective future. This perspective promises to deliver substantial benefits to societies, communities, and economies globally. As a result, the world is witnessing a concerted effort to elevate the status of nurses and other healthcare professionals, positioning them as crucial catalysts for positive change.

The Malaysian Journal of Nursing (MJN) stands in solidarity with the global healthcare community, taking a proactive stance to ensure the well-being of nurses. The journal actively engages in efforts to facilitate publication of healthcare articles for humanitarian aid. In doing so, the journal promotes global health and safeguard the causes of nurses and healthcare workers around the world. MJN, with its rich repository of articles, plays a pivotal role in identifying and addressing the crucial elements of social cohesion in nursing and healthcare fostering peace and social stability. By focusing on healthcare, nursing care and research, the journal aims to contribute to the ongoing discourse to achieve the overarching goal of creating a healthier, more peaceful world. Together, we can ensure that healthcare is not merely a service but a cornerstone for building a brighter, healthier future for everyone.
