The nurses despite challenges, continue to uphold their fundamental commitment to life, dignity, and compassionate care. They remain on the front lines of health services, caring for the injured, supporting families experiencing profound distress, and maintaining essential healthcare delivery systems under conditions of significant personal risk. The ethical and professional obligations of the nursing profession compel nurses to provide care to those in need, regardless of the surrounding circumstances. Their continued dedication reflects the core values of nursing, including compassion, responsibility, and respect for human life. However, the ongoing threats to healthcare personnel and infrastructure raise serious concerns for the safety and sustainability of health services. The principle of medical neutrality requires that health services remain protected and free from interference.

In light of these realities, the global nursing and healthcare community must reaffirm its solidarity. Nurses are caregivers dedicated to preserving life and alleviating suffering. Ensuring that they are able to perform their duties safely, ethically, and with dignity. This is not only professional necessity but also a moral and rightful imperative for the international community. In this context, The Malaysian Journal of Nursing continues to play a vital role in presenting healthcare guidelines and advancing nursing practice by bringing forward the experiences and perspectives of nurses working on the front lines of care. The articles presented in this issue of the Malaysian Journal of Nursing further contribute to this mission by offering evidence-based insights, practical perspectives, and scholarly discussions that support the advancement of nursing knowledge, strengthen clinical practice, and ultimately enhance the quality of patient care across diverse healthcare settings.
